John R. Wettin Guelph

Excerpt from The Memoirs of Prince John De Guelph, Rex Et Imperator De Jure of Great Britain and Ireland

Here comes a story, a realistic romance, which simply, as such, compels a reading by its human interest and sets us thinking over the mysteries of life and luck. The writer of these lines had known nothing of the author of the book, nor had he ever seen him, when by sheer chance some of its printed pages came to hand.

A general prejudice against claims of this nature gave piquancy to the reading. After allowing it full play, the outcome of a fair consideration of the entire case is this:

The claimant verily believes in his claim, which fact alone lifts him out of the vulgar impostor class. He is not a nobody, with nothing individual to claim our attention but his claim. He has lived a large life, crowded with activities so varied, and in the main so clearly conducted toward the introduction of desirable reforms in the Home and Colonial Government for the better administration of the Empire in the interest of the people, and in the furtherance of universal peace, as proven by the official data cited, that his story would be good and instructive reading without its supreme attraction - the claim.
